

Highlights

- A measurable share of the Solow residual is a measurement artefact, not technology
- Correcting lags and omitted intangibles reconciles flow- and wealth-side accounts
- An OECD asset-composition proxy validates the lag without free parameters
- Adjustments are largest in research-intensive, long-gestation economies
- Policy implication: the correction affects potential-output and policy calibration